World War II story alternates between the past and present, linked by a fateful song. Japanese sub I-77 battles an American destroyer off the coast of Okinawa. Before heading to war, the captain received a final present from his lover, the score to a song titled Manatsu no Orion. 64 years later, his granddaughter discovers the score and the significance behind the song. This movie actually was quite nice for a war drama. For a World War 2 drama there was surprisingly little fighting going on, but the movie did quite well even without that aspect of the war.

The movie takes place at the end of World War 2, following a Japanese submarine pitched against an American destroyer. Doesn't sound like much of a story, but it was actually quite entertaining and good to watch. And if you enjoyed "Das Boot", then you will also like this movie.

Director Tetsuo Shinohara managed to put together a good movie, and really were able to portray some good drama on the screen, especially since the setting was limited to a submarine and a destroyer. But a lot of credit also goes to the cast who really put on amazing performances, especially the guy playing the Japanese submarine captain.

The movie is built up and filmed in such a way that you almost feel like you are part of the submarine crew and find yourself right there in the cramped space of the submarine.

If you enjoy World War 2 movies and want something that differs from the majority of the genre, then you should give "Battle Under Orion" (aka "Manatsu no Orion") a chance. I was thoroughly entertained and can warmly recommend this movie. A movie about the final days of the Second World War in the Pacific, and the submarine I-77 which is given the task to be the final line of defense in the American assault on Okinawa. Supplies are low, and the fate grim for the submarine, but the captain is determined to return home with his crew alive. One reason for this is his best friend's little sister, who he is in love with. Their story is interwoven with the battle at sea to highlight the captain's feelings and reasons behind his decision. He needs to be very shrewd to survive.

A good war movie with a good duel between the submarine and a destroyer. But it is the story which doesn't focus on just the action but also honor, duty and perhaps foremost compassion and the will to survive. The last is the most surprising. Many war movies tell harsh tales of suffering and death, and even though the situation is grim, the feeling is almost warm and comforting. An unusual contrast indeed, and the movie benefits from it. The story is not very surprising, almost predictable, but it doesn't matter much since it is the fate of the crew that is important.

Good acting all around (especially from the captain (Tamaki?)), and refreshing to see a war movie not from an Allied viewpoint with another perspective.
